

Why Franchising Could be the Answer to Retailing Cannabis in Ontario

Frank Robinson

October 18, 2018

People across Canada this week will walk into stores and legally purchase marijuana. But not in Ontario. A recent and radical restructuring of the cannabis retail regime from public to private, though welcome by many, has left the largest market for cannabis consumption in Canada the least prepared.

Ontarians will instead make their marijuana purchases online through the government-run Ontario Cannabis Store, unable to make any in-store purchases until next April and after the province consults with municipalities, law enforcement, and stakeholders to determine how a privatized bricks-and-mortar model should roll out.

Without question, a slow out-of-the-gate provincial pot monopoly as proposed by the prior government would have been an anachronism destined to miss the mark, to leave consumers underserved and disinterested, and to shutout a dynamic force for growth in the private sector.

To read the rest of this article on Retail Insider, click here.

This publication is a general summary of the law. It does not replace legal advice tailored to your specific circumstances.