Biography

Mark St. Cyr (he/him/his) is a partner in the Construction & Infrastructure Groups at Cassels, where he provides strategic and practical legal advice to clients at any stage of any construction project. From initial concept, through design, procurement, and construction Mark advises clients on how to navigate and redistribute project risks.

With Mark's broad drafting, negotiating, and solutions-driven experience, he has had the privilege of representing clients on a wide variety of projects across nearly every industry, throughout Ontario, the rest of Canada, and several other parts of the world. Mark's practice includes both "front-end" project structure and delivery advice, as well as "back-end" dispute resolution.

On the front-end, Mark advises clients on project structure, procurement, and project delivery models, identifying the best contractual model to suit their project. Recognizing the complex arrangements that are sometimes necessary to deliver large-scale infrastructure, Mark has the proven ability to turn complexity into concise and straightforward bespoke solutions. In addition, he has extensive experience drafting and negotiating all forms of agreements one might find on a construction project, as well as new, innovative, and complex contracts such as alternative financing (P3/PPP), integrated project delivery (IPD), "design-assist," and "bridging" agreements.

In addition to providing advice over the life of his clients' projects, Mark also maintains a construction advocacy practice where he represents clients on the "back-end" of projects during dispute resolution. Mark is active as both plaintiff's counsel and defendant's counsel in construction lien actions, bidding and tendering disputes, bond actions, breach of trust claims, and delay and deficiency claims. Mark's approach to disputes is to resolutely advance the position of his clients to set up success at trial, while also identifying opportunities for a commercially sensible early resolution.
